FRIDAY's POST.

LONDON, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1837.

THE Messager says that on the 27th General Seoane fought three officers of the Guard at Madrid, when he killed two and severely wounded the third, himself receiving but a slight wound in the left side. The Messager adds that disturbances took place at Madrid on the 29th, and that on M. de la Tour Maubourg complaining of the language held in the secret sitting of the Cortes on the 28th, Maria Christina replied, "M. Ambassador, demand your passports, or send for the 100,000 men whom you promised me in the name of my uncle."

A letter from Burgos states that most of the towns of that province refuse to obey the Queen's authorities, and that the same spirit of rebellion is breaking out in the Asturias and all along the Corunna coast.—Courier.

We are happy to find by the accounts both from Liverpool and Manchester, that commerce, almost in every branch, is reviving, particularly in the manufacturing districts, where all hands are employed.

It seems that there are 217 provincial newspapers published in England—out of which 112 are Liberal, 84 Tory, and 21 Neutral. The consumption of stamps for these papers during the first six months of 1837 has been—Liberal papers, 4,466,572; Tory papers, 2,319,543; Neutral papers, 403,745. Thus we see that the readers of Liberal papers are double those of the Tory papers, and that there are very few readers who are Neutral.—York Herald.

THE SAVAGES OF TORRES' STRAITS.

At the Mansion-House, on Wednesday, Mr. Drew, and a gentleman of the name of Wellington, accompanied by John Ireland, a lad about nineteen years of age, appeared before Alderman Pirie, and made the following statement:—

Mr. Drew said he was brother-in-law to one of the passengers who was on board the Charles Eaton when that vessel was wrecked in Torres' Straits in August, 1834, and that John Ireland was the lad who was seen on Murray's Island amongst the savages when the ship Mangles touched at that place to barter; that William D'Oyly, a child, the son of Captain and Mrs. D'Oyly, who were murdered by the savages of the Island of Boidang, was on Murray's Island at the same time; and that Ireland was convinced, if two or three axes had been offered to the natives, he and the little boy would have been at once given up to the crew. From this lad it had been ascertained that all the passengers and crew of the Charles Eaton who had been seized by the savages were murdered, with the exception of the infant and himself.

Alderman Pirie said that he was aware of the circumstances of the loss of the vessel, and the report that several murders had been committed, and asked Ireland several questions upon the subject, which he answered without hesitation.

Mr. Drew said that his object in appearing at the Mansion-House was, to press the necessity of the interference of the Colonial Government to prevent such horrible treatment as unfortunate people who were wrecked upon those islands were subjected to. It would be necessary to have a minute survey taken of the coast, as the coral reefs were forming islands every day; and intimidation should be held out to the chiefs of the savages, to check their disposition to shed the blood of people whose colour differed from their own.

Alderman Pirie said that the Government had given orders to the effect alluded to, and that he had no doubt of the efficacy of the labours which had been undertaken for the purpose of accomplishing the object.

Mr. Drew said the poor lad had been two years along with the child amongst the savages, and had arrived not many days from Sydney, having worked his passage home, and was now without a situation and penniless.

The following is the account given by Ireland of the occurrences after the vessel struck on the coral reef near Torres Straits:—

"There were twenty-six of the crew and the family of Captain D'Oyly, consisting of himself, his wife, his two children, George and Wm. D'Oyly, and the servant maid, and a young gentleman from Ireland of the name of Armstrong. The passengers had been on a party of pleasure. The coral reef on which we struck was called Detach Reef. We set about making a raft from the timbers of the wreck, and after great labour we constructed one in the course of seven days. When we got upon the raft, and into deep water, we found that it went too deep, and we returned to the wreck to remedy the fault. The Captain and the passengers remained on the raft, and the crew went to the wreck, and in the morning we missed the raft with the Captain and passengers. The rope had been cut away in the course of the night, and the raft had drifted down with the tide. We then set to make another raft, and we completed one in seven days more, on which we all got and drifted with the tide—living on two wine glasses each of distilled salt water a day and a little broken biscuit. For two days and two nights we continued to go along with the current and the wind, and one of the men was drowned. At the end of that time we saw something a-head of us, which turned out to be a canoe with from fifteen to twenty natives in it naked. The canoe approached, and the natives made signs to us that they would use us well, to induce us to go on board; we did so, and then they let the raft drift away, and they took us ashore on one of the small islands called Boidang Island by the inhabitants.

"We were all greatly exhausted and fatigued, and we lay down to sleep. I was suddenly awakened by the violence of a native, who had in his hand a knife, which I afterwards found they had taken from the captain and passengers on the first raft. He endeavoured, as I thought, to cut my throat, but I struggled hard for my life, and I had the best of it. I then ran into the water, determined to swim out and be drowned rather than be killed and eaten; but I turned back, and the native that attacked me did not continue the attack. On the contrary, he acted kindly to me, and saved me from violence from the hands of the others. I soon perceived that every one of the crew, except a boy like myself, named Sexton, was murdered. Some had their brains dashed out, and others were stabbed, and the savages, after they stripped the bodies, let them down with the tide, keeping all the heads, which they placed in a row before the fire. They eat no part except the eyes and cheeks. Next day they took us off to another island in their canoes, in which they brought all the heads of the crew, and on landing on the beach we saw a Newfoundland dog, which we at once knew to be Captain D'Oyly's, and which he had brought from the Isle of Wight with him, and soon afterwards we saw George and William D'Oyly. George appeared to be seven or eight years old, and William was about fourteen or fifteen months. They were with some of the native women. George approached the canoe in which were Sexton and myself, and we asked him what had become of his father and mother? He replied that the blacks had killed them, and the captain, and Mr. Armstrong, and the servant girl, and that he and his little brother were all that remained alive. I told him that all the crew were murdered, except myself and Sexton. The natives then took us into some huts which they had on the island, and set us down before a fire, and I saw there, Mrs. D'Oyly's gown, which she had on when we were wrecked, and the steward's watch and white hat. A few days afterwards a ship hove in sight, and I did all I could to prevail upon the natives to take us to it, but they would not part with us. Seven days after two more ships which were in company came close to the shore. The natives then moved about in all directions, and took us and all the skulls and the Newfoundland dog, into the bush, and the ships passed along. The little boy used to cry often, and the women used to tie him up to a tree and beat him with a bamboo for making a noise; and when I interfered to prevent their cruelty, they used to shoot at me. We were not long after this when the Murray Island inhabitants came across the sands, and bought me and William D'Oyly of the Boidang natives for a few bunches of banna fruit, and Sexton and George D'Oyly were taken away by those who sold us to another island, but where I could not learn, although I afterwards learned that they were both murdered.

"The natives, who purchased me and Wm. D'Oyly, took us to Murray's Island, where we became quite accustomed to them, and were treated much better than we had been before by any of the blacks; they were certainly less savage than any we had seen before, and I became acquainted with their language. They had small gardens, in which they cultivated yams, and plaintains, and cocoa nuts. When I got acquainted with their language, I heard one of them tell another, that George D'Oyly and Sexton had been killed by the natives of Boidang Island. They had never told me any thing about it, and I only understood it from the conversation between each other. I had lost all the power of counting time soon after I got to Murray's Island, but we were there a very long time when the ship Mangles appeared in sight and anchored off Murray's Island. The natives broke a large bough, and I waved it from a height at the ship, but no boat came off to us. I then went down along with some of the natives to the beach. This was in the afternoon, but no boat came ashore to us. Next morning, the natives and I went over to the ship in several canoes, and we got alongside. I was in the third or fourth canoe from the vessel, and we dropped directly under her stern. A rope was thrown down from the ship to our canoe, and I took hold of it, and I could have got on board by it, but was unable, having sprained my wrist a day or two before. One of the crew handed down a quid of tobacco to me, and I said, 'Will you lower down the boat and I will get in.' The captain and officers were at this time bartering with the natives. They lowered down the starboard cutter, and put their naked cutlasses and pistols into it, and the natives, when they saw that, were afraid that the crew were going to kill me and themselves too, and let go the rope and began to paddle towards shore. When I stood up in the canoe, one of them took hold of me and put me down in the middle of it.

"It has been said that I shunned those who tried to get me away, and that I appeared to prefer being with the savages. Never was any thing more false or ridiculous. The natives were afraid that violence was intended, and they, therefore, paddled to shore. The boy was at this time along with the women in the bush; but I knew perfectly well that they would have as readily given us up to the captain of the Mangles as they did to the captain of the Isabella, by whom we were liberated. If pains had been taken, we might have been purchased for two or three axes, for the natives had no objection at all. The ship's boat made three or four strokes after us, and then returned to the vessel. A few hours afterwards, the boat came close to the beach, with, I believe, the captain on board, to shoot birds, and one of the natives took the little boy on his shoulders, and went towards the boat, and beckoned to the crew to come and take him, and the captain beckoned to the natives to approach the boat, but neither would approach the other closer. I was in the bush all this time, and I observed what was going on, and the boat soon afterwards returned to the vessel. Next morning the vessel sailed, and both of us remained on the island till the Isabella, which was sent from Sydney for us, arrived. When we saw the vessel from the island we launched the canoes, but the natives were unwilling to let me go with them to the vessel, as they were afraid I should be killed. I, however, persuaded them to let me go, and I promised to get them some tomahawks and return to them. I was obliged to leave the boy on shore, of course. When I got to the vessel the captain asked me what ship I belonged to, and I told him to the Charles Eaton, and that all the crew and passengers, except myself and a little boy, who was on the island, were murdered by the Boidang natives. I then went on board, and I told the natives to fetch the boy, and next morning they brought him along with them to the ship. The captain gave to them in exchange for us some axes, beads, gowns, and fishing-hooks, and he supplied us with clothes. We then, after trading with the natives for six or seven days, set sail for Sydney, where I remained three or four months. William D'Oyly is still kept in Sydney by Mrs. Slade, a friend of the family, and I was very sorry to be parted from the poor child, who was so much to be pitied. To describe what we have undergone is quite out of my power."

It is proper to say that the captain of the Mangles, in the mayoralty of Alderman Copeland, brought forward the mate, who stated distinctly that the white man, who was among the savages, showed the most determined resolution not to leave the society of the blacks, and that finding the young man's taste was so much against joining his own countrymen, the ship's boat gave up the pursuit.

[It may be interesting to some of our readers to know that the orphan child, William D'Oyly, is daily expected to arrive in this country, whither he has been forwarded from Sydney. His poor mother, in her childhood, was personally known to the Princesses, who induced their good hearted brother, William the Fourth, to take a lively interest in the search for the survivors of the unfortunate vessel, and moreover to obtain appointments for the two sons of Captain D'Oyly, who have been at school for the last six years in England. The appointments were made in that true spirit of benevolence which forbids the left hand knowing what the right hand doeth. On enquiry at the India House, it appeared that the Secretary had been directed not to mention the source whence the appointments were derived, but he remarked that the interest was the highest.

The infant, William D'Oyly, was only relinquished by his Excellency Sir Richard Bourke, into the hands of Mrs. Slade, whose husband holds an official appointment, on an investigation into her claims of affection and old friendship for the family. The father of Mrs. Slade, Captain Cameron, commanded the Jane, Duchess of Gordon, which foundered off the Mauritius, in 1807, when every soul perished, including the twin brother of Captain D'Oyly, who was an officer on board.—EDIT. Gloucestershire County Meeting.

On Wednesday last, in pursuance of a requisition to the High Sheriff, Henry Norwood Trye, Esq. a county meeting was held at the Shire Hall in this city for the purpose of addressing her Majesty and the Queen Dowager. Soon after twelve o'clock a great many of the leading noblemen and gentlemen of the county had assembled, among whom we noticed Lord Segrave, the Lord Lieutenant of the county, the Duke of Beaufort, Lord John Somerset, Lord Moreton, Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, Lord Ellenborough, Hon. Grantley Berkeley, M.P., Hon. W. L. Bathurst, Sir M. H. Beach, Bart., Sir John Wright Guise, Bart., R. B. Hale, Esq. M.P., T. G. B. Estcourt, Esq. M.P., Alderman Wood, M.P., Col. Browne, Capt. Harward, Capt. St. Clair, Capt. Probyn, P. B. Purnell, Esq., J. E. Viner, Esq., L. Clutterbuck, Esq., R. F. Jenner, Esq., C. Bathurst, Esq., T. H. Kingscote, Esq., T. J. L. Baker, Esq., W. L. Lawrence, Esq., M. Colchester, Esq., E. Machen, Esq., R. Holford, Esq., B. Crawley, Esq., R. Martin, Esq., H. C. Clifford, Esq., J. Mills, Esq., H. Vizard, Esq., E. Bloxsome, Esq., E. G. Hallewell, Esq., W. J. Ellis, Esq., &c. &c.

It will be seen by this enumeration that many gentlemen of the two great leading political parties were present, and perhaps the most gratifying circumstance in the whole proceedings of the day was the total absence of any thing like political acerbity during every part of the discussion.

The High Sheriff said, in compliance with the requisition which he held in his hand he had called together that meeting of the county, for the two-fold purpose of congratulating her present Majesty on her accession to the throne of this kingdom, and also for the purpose of expressing their condolence with their late Majesty's consort upon the loss she had sustained. He trusted—indeed he knew it would be so from the resolutions he had received, which were couched in such a manner as that they could not fail to meet the cordial approbation of all present, that they would all join heart and hand in expressing their loyalty to the throne.

The requisition having been read, Lord Segrave moved, and the Duke of Beaufort seconded, that the High Sheriff take the chair and preside at that meeting.

Lord Segrave then said,—Mr. High Sheriff and my Lords and Gentlemen, I feel great pleasure from the conviction I entertain that unanimity will accompany our proceedings this day; for though, most unquestionably, there is great difference of opinion among us in this county, as in all others, as to who are the best parties to form an administration and most competent to carry on the government, yet, as the High Sheriff has justly observed, I firmly believe and trust, we are all linked together by one strong and indissoluble tie when the question under consideration is the expression of loyalty to the throne and of attachment to our Sovereign. (Cheers.) The simple question for our consideration, gentlemen, is the manner in which we shall express our humble and sincere congratulation to that illustrious lady, our Queen, on the event by which it has pleased Divine Providence to call her to the throne of her ancestors; and while we may, and while we do, deeply deplore the loss of that monarch, whose paternal care we invariably experienced, we may be permitted to look forward with hope that her present Majesty's reign, which has so auspiciously commenced, may be long continued and be always accompanied with peace and contentment. (Cheers.) History, gentlemen, has already presented us with examples that under the dominion of female sovereigns it is possible for this country to attain the highest pitch of prosperity at home, and at the same time become formidable to our enemies abroad. No two reigns are more illustrative of these points than those of Elizabeth and Anne. (Hear, hear!) I have now, gentlemen, only one word to add upon the subject on which we are met here this day; and that is in reference to the period at which it has fallen; and as I was chiefly instrumental in fixing that period, I beg to state why I did not propose that you should be called together at an earlier time. The demise of the crown entailed as a consequence a general election, and party spirit was necessarily put in action in all parts of the kingdom through the medium of a general canvass. It appeared to me most desirable that time should be given for the elections to terminate, and for any acrimony party feeling might have engendered to subside, before this meeting was called, as I considered it essential that we should have upon such an occasion as the present the utmost unanimity and concord. (Cheers.) Whether I am correct in that feeling I will not pretend to say, and I can only add, that the Lord Lieutenant of the county of Kent, according to newspaper report, has been influenced in a still stronger degree by the same consideration, having suggested the propriety of deferring yet longer the holding of a similar meeting in that county, that the great acerbity which sometimes unfortunately accompanies contested elections might have more time to pass away. His Lordship concluded by saying that he would not detain them longer, but would move that the address he had the honour to propose be adopted by the meeting.

The address having been read,

The Lord Bishop said,—My Lords and Gentlemen, I have been desired to second the address, you have just heard read. I wish that duty had fallen into more worthy hands, though it could have been undertaken by none with more sincerity and more cordiality than myself. I assent to every word contained in that address, and no one could rejoice more fully to see that unanimity displayed which the Noble Lord Lieutenant has alluded to, and which I trust always will be shown whenever the question is loyalty to the throne, and attachment to that family from which this country has received such great blessings. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, as the Noble Lord has justly said, Englishmen may look back with proud satisfaction to two illustrious female reigns in this country, as periods when the national glory was at its height, and when the arts of peace, as well as war, were most successfully cultivated. We all trust that the reign of our present youthful and amiable Queen may be long and happy; and I dare say that the general feeling is, that the country has seen so much military glory, that all would rather that the present reign should be distinguished by the arts and triumphs of peace. (Cheers.) A more auspicious commencement of a reign can hardly be known than the present, her Majesty having herself declared her earnest desire to do every thing in her power to preserve the liberties, and promote the happiness of her Majesty's subjects, and particularly expressed her wish that whatever was harsh and severe in the laws of former times may, under her reign, be mitigated. (Cheers.) But I must observe, gentlemen, that there is one circumstance which favourably distinguishes our present Queen's reign from those of her two illustrious predecessors, Elizabeth and Anne. In their times, the country suffered under the extreme mischief of a disputed succession; at the present time, happily, there is not an individual in the country who entertains the least doubt concerning the legality of Queen Victoria's right to the crown, or who is not ready to defend it to the utmost of his power. (Cheers.) The youth of her Majesty has prevented the possibility of much being known of her character; but I must observe that all that is known, without exception, is such as to encourage the feelings and aspirations of all her faithful subjects. What is most important is, that we know she has been well, carefully, and religiously educated—not educated merely in the accomplishments which befit her sex, and render it amiable, but she has made, as I happen to know, much progress in severer studies also. About four years ago, two Right Rev. friends of mine had the honour to be appointed to examine her Majesty, as to her proficiency in her learning, and I heard from them that she then translated before them with great correctness Cæsar's Commentaries in the original Latin, and that she had in fact made at least as great proficiency as at the same age her illustrious predecessor Elizabeth had made under the tuition of Roger Ascham. (Hear, hear!) The inhabitants of this city have had the high gratification of seeing their present Queen amongst them; and though it is now seven years ago I can still mention with proud satisfaction that I had the honour of receiving her Majesty and her illustrious mother under my roof; and at that time the pleasing demeanour of her then Royal Highness Princess Victoria, and indeed the conduct of both our illustrious visitors were such as to occasion the best hopes among us. Nothing could exceed the affable, sensible, and kind demeanour of the Duchess of Kent, under whose care, as we all know, her Majesty's whole life has been passed; and it was then remarked by all that we could not but have the best hopes in reference to a daughter of such a mother as we then had the honour of seeing. (Cheers) The Noble Lord has adverted to the subject of party politics, as one which might be happily banished from an occasion like this. We all know that there is great evil in the party divisions existing now, and more or less at all times among us; but it is an evil which must be compounded for—which we must be satisfied with submitting to; because all history informs us that in all nations enjoying civil liberty in perfection such parties always have and always will exist; and, after all, they are indeed a security against the loss of that liberty which an entire absence from them or an entire devotion to one set of opinions would probably cause. But it is of course a great delight to us to find that there are topics—and I am happy to say there are many topics—on which people can agree; and this fortunately is one of them. We all lament the loss of an amiable and kind King, who had himself, in early life, distinguished himself as a member of that glorious profession to which we owe our national prosperity and independence, and who, when in possession of the highest power exhibited as many amiable qualities as perhaps ever were or ever could be displayed by a sovereign, and which had secured him the hearts of his people. We have, at the same time, every happy promise before us, in our present Sovereign; but I must again say that the greatest of all securities, on which we can most firmly rely, is that the Queen has been piously and religiously educated; and under all the vicissitudes of her reign—which I trust will be long and happy—that is the one unvarying polar star to which I trust she will ever look. I am, concluded his Lordship, obliged to you for the kindness with which you have heard me, and I cordially from my heart second the resolution proposed by the Noble Lord. (Cheers.)

The resolution was then put by the High Sheriff and carried unanimously.

The Duke of Beaufort said, they had heard the Noble Lord and the Right Rev. Prelate express their gratification at the auspicious commencement of her Majesty's reign. In every thing which had fallen from them he most cordially concurred; and in nothing more so than in the sentiment that unanimity should prevail upon an occasion like the present. He had now to propose an address of condolence to her Majesty the Queen Dowager, and he was sure that the same unanimity which had pervaded the assembly with regard to the address to the Queen would also be felt in respect to the address of condolence to his late Majesty's consort, on the loss her Majesty and the nation at large had sustained. (Cheers.) The Noble Duke then read the address, and proposed that it be adopted by the meeting.

Lord Moreton said, in coming forward to second the address moved by his Noble Friend, he felt that it was perfectly unnecessary to say many words, because he was aware how very inadequate anything he or any one else could say would be to do justice to those feelings by which her Majesty's bosom must be affected. He was sure they would be unanimous in this expression of condolence for the loss she had suffered, when they considered how great it must be, and compared the loss with that which they had as individuals sustained in the death of William the Fourth, to whose reign future generations would look back with pride and gratitude. (Cheers.)

The address was put and carried unanimously.

Sir John W. Guise moved that the address of congratulation to the Queen, and the address of condolence to the Queen Dowager, be presented by the Lord Lieutenant of the county, Lord Segrave, and that he be accompanied on those occasions by the Duke of Beaufort, Lord Ellenborough, and Lord Moreton.

The motion was seconded by T. J. L. Baker, Esq. and carried unanimously.

The Hon. G. F. Berkeley, M.P. moved that the warmest thanks of the meeting be given to the High Sheriff for his able and impartial conduct in the chair, which was seconded by R. B. Hale, Esq. M.P. and carried unanimously.

The High Sheriff returned thanks in appropriate terms, and expressed the gratification he felt at the unanimity and good feeling which had characterised the proceedings. The meeting then separated.

[We are authorised to state that the Duke of Beaufort considered himself as having given authority for affixing his name to the requisition, and was surprised at finding it had not appeared amongst those of the requisitionists.]

A very heavy and serious charge is made against Lord John Russell in Blackwood's last Magazine. It amounts to this—that his Lordship is guilty of the sin of frugality, and actually lives within his income. How many tradesmen would rejoice if their Tory customers did the same.

A recent tourist in the Highlands mentions a novel mode an innkeeper had of ascertaining what would be the state of the weather:—"He has only to send his flock of geese to the loch-side, and if they put out to sea, it will be fair; if they anchor on shore, it will be rainy."

A USEFUL HINT.—Reformers would do well to remember and act upon the following just observation in Lacon: "Villainy, that is vigilant, will be an overmatch for virtue, if she slumber on her post; and hence it is that a bad cause has often triumphed over a good one; for the partisans of the former, knowing that their cause will do nothing for them, have done every thing for their cause; whereas the friends of the latter are too apt to expect every thing from their cause, and to do nothing for themselves."

ROYAL STUD.—A memorial has been presented to Lord Melbourne, signed by nine Peers and twelve Commoners, who take an interest in sporting matters, against the proposed dissolution of the Royal stud at Hampton Court, which is announced for sale on the 25th of October.

BANK OF ENGLAND.—The Governor and Company of the Bank of England have given notice, that on and after the 7th inst. they will be ready to receive applications for loans, upon the deposit of approved Bills of Exchange, not having more than six months to run; such loans to be repaid on or before the 20th Oct. next, with interest at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum, and to be for loans of not less than 2000*l.* each.

At the present moment money is very easy, and first-rate bills are discounted at 3, 2¾, and in some cases as low as 2½ per cent. It is understood that the Bank of England are adopting liberal measures, some of their Directors finding it much to their interest to encourage speculators, in order that they may get rid of their vast stocks of tea, silk, cotton, and other articles.
